Sexual offending has been and remains a major societal concern. Over the past few decades, researchers and clinicians have identified a number of factors associated with understanding, assessing, and treating sexual offenders. These include distorted attitudes, self-regulatory problems, and social/emotional issues. However, the factor that has remained under the academic and clinical spotlight the longest is sexual interest.

Understanding sexual interests (and sexuality more generally) is itself a huge endeavor given the various processes involved (i.e., cognitive, affective, physiological). Therefore, to fully explain the influence of sexual interests on sexual offending, each of these sub-factors needs to be addressed (from both a typical and atypical stance). Only then will we acquire a comprehensive approach to assessing and treating inappropriate sexual interests, so as to effectively prevent sexual (re)offending.

In this one-day conference, the University of Lincoln's Forensic and Clinical Research Group, along with some of our collaborators, will present cutting-edge theory and research associated with sex and sexual offending. There will be a focus on how this research can be applied in practice for those who work professionally with sexual offenders.
